

LITERARY NOTES.

Mr. Trollope's autobiography has reached a second edition in London. Mr. Laurence Oliphant's "Altona Poco" has gone into a fourth edition.

That excellent publication, Littles Living Age, will soon complete its 100th volume.

Mr. F. Marion Crawford is returning from Rome with the intention of spending the winter in Boston. His "Roman Singer" improves with every number.

This half-pathetic, half-comic story of Turgenieff's youth is related by his old friend, M. Aumenkoff: Turgenieff frequented the St. Petersburg University. At the beginning he had plenty of money, but all at once his supply stopped, the student having had a quarrel with his mother. This became very awkward, for Turgenieff's pride vented him asking his friends for help, and yet he could not live on nothing. At last he had an original idea. Some of his friends dined every day at a cafe, and as things got worse, Turgenieff regularly paid a visit to them at their dinner hour, sat down beside them, talked, and, as if absent-minded, ate as many pieces of bread as his manipulation had been noticed by the host, who reproached the waiter for allowing such things. One day the old waiter said to Turgenieff, "I have been scolded because of your bread-eating habit; but never mind, don't be disturbed." This good-natured remark bore golden fruit to the old man. Shortly after Turgenieff became reconciled with his mother, and rewarded the waiter in a princely manner.

Keshub Chunder Sen, the Hindoo reformer, has prepared a series of articles for The Independent, the first of which will appear this week under the title of "Yoga; or the Devotional Life."

The publications of J. R. Osgood & Co. will hereafter be found in this city at the agency of Mr. C. L. Webster, 658 Broadway.

The problem of successful authorship has been studied by an English "literary lady" with a curious result. She advertises in a London newspaper that she, being "desirous of making her writings more fully known, seeks the services of a thoroughly good reader, who would read or give public recitations of her poems and essays." The agonizing dreariness of these "poems and essays" probably goes without saying.

Mr. John Boyle O'Reilly is more friendly and enthusiastic than was in talking of the late Dr. Joyce's "splendid literary fame," and of his position "in the foremost rank of the literary world." The members of that "foremost rank" are few, and the author of "Deirdre" and "Blandi" was certainly not among them. Loose enclosures like these do no good to the memory of a second or third rate writer.

"Napoleon's Dispatches" have been edited by Captain the Hon. D. Bingham, and will shortly be published in London. Captain Bingham is the author of the entertaining book, "The Marriages of the Bonapartes." It was republished by the Harpers.

The last number of Mr. Ruskin's lors Clavigers is entitled "Dust of Gold," and is illustrated by Miss Kate Greenaway.

Mr. William Black is reported to believe that his new story, "Judith Shakespeare," will prove to be the best that he has yet written. Mr. Black's last work, it must be said, showed plenty of room for improvement.

The new edition of Brillat-Savarin's "Physiologie du Goût" will be one of three hundred copies only. It is to be called "A Handbook of Gastronomy"—a stupid title—is to be printed on China paper, and to be illustrated with fifty-two original etchings by Lalanne.

Mr. Austin Dobson's new-old volume has this graceful roundel for dedication:

To you I sing, whom towns immerse
And bodes of toil, where nothing sight;
Centred woodlands bathed in April light,
And dreams of pastures premature,
And you, O sad, who still endure,
Some wond' that only Time can cure,

But most to you with eyelids pure,
Scented with odors of love or lust;

To you, with bird-like glances bright,
Half-paused to speak, half-posed in flight,
O English girl, divine, deute,

To you I sing.

The new periodical, Shakespeariana, promises to be an admirable publication, scholarly enough to interest men of letters and animated and familiar enough to entertain less learned readers. The plan of the magazine includes dramatic criticisms, reviews of Shakespearian publications, a department of notes and queries, one of correspondence, and another of transactions of Shakespearian societies. The first number has an attractive paper by J. P. Morris on the Stratford bust.

In respect to Messrs. W. J. Linton and R. H. Stoddard's collection of "English Verse," of which two volumes are now issued, it is understood that the duty of selecting the poems to be included, and of verifying the text, was assigned exclusively to Mr. Linton, who is solely responsible for the method of its fulfillment. Mr. Stoddard's labor and responsibility are confined to the authorship of the learned and elaborate Prefaces to the respective volumes.

Lord Archibald Campbell, son of the Duke of Argyll, is maintaining the literary credit of the family. He has just finished a work entitled "Records of Argyll."
